Flight of Time.

We have often alluded to the feeling, chich increases with increasing age, of the rapidity with which time passes In youth a year seems almost interminable, in middle age it seems only a short time to look either backward or forward; while in old age "the days are swifter than a weaver's shuttle" in their flight, and "we spend our years as a tale that is told." But there is another thing in connection with the passing of ime that becomes more impressive as years roll by, and that is its irrevocable ness;; the certainty that whatever opportunities we lose are never going to be offered to us again, and happy indeed are those who have not in advanced years many such lost opportunities to regret. The worst of it is that such chances appear to us more clearly in retrospect than they ever can in looking forward. Things that did not appear to matter much at the moment have a way of assuming important proportions as we look back at them and realize all the consequences to which they lead and how much better it would be had we acted differently at the time the opportunity was presented to us.-Charleston News and Courier.
